What's in a name?

Street names can tell their own stories. Glue House Lane, Pipetrack Lane and Chapel Terrace (pictured here in 1905) give us clear clues. Other street names have more obscure origins. Blakett Street in Scotswood was named after the area's major landowner.

The famous developer Richard Grainger and his wife Rachel had 13 children, of whom 11 lived to adulthood. Their names were given to many of the 19th century terraced streets in Elswick and Benwell, including Theodosia, Maria, Amelia, Juliet and Mathilda.

Some streets were given new names. Gretna Road used to be known as Lovers Lane. Sunnybank Avenue, Pendower, was first called Tentop Avenue. This 1920s picture shows the estate soon after it was built. Does anyone know the origins of the name "Tentop"?

Healthcare before the NHS

Please share your stories with us

We are collecting stories and memories about healthcare in the West End before the establishment of the National Health Service. Have you personal or family stories you can share?

Some of you might have memories or know family stories of what happened when you were ill before there was a free health service. Most people had to pay a doctor, get help from a neighbour or try a home remedy.

Infectious diseases were major killers until after the War. Treatment often involved being kept in isolation in a fever hospital for weeks. This was especially hard for children as hospitals didn't allow visitors. They might not see their parents for a long time.

Fresh air was thought to be good for children with illnesses such as tuberculosis. Pendower Open Air School on the West Road – the highest point in the area – was Newcastle's answer to Switzerland. Children were taught in the open air even when it was freezing.

And what about when babies were born? There were maternity hospitals, such as Hopedene on Elswick Road, but it was common to give birth at home with the help of an experienced but unqualified neighbour.

People relied more on medicines bought from pharmacists or on home remedies such as spreading goose grease on your chest to treat a bronchial infection.

What was it like to work as a nurse or midwife before the NHS?

Can you identify this building?

This used to be Newcastle Workhouse which stood on what became the General Hospital site. The workhouse was built in the mid-19th century on the corner of Westgate Road and Brighton Grove. It was the city's first purpose-built workhouse, providing bed and board in return for work for the able-bodied poor. Accommodation was added for the sick, insane and others incapable of work and, later, an Infirmary was built next to it.

Did you know How Benwell High Cross got its name?

The area known today as High Cross lies between St James' Church and the eastern end of Adelaide Terrace.

A market cross used to stand here. This was erected in either the 16th or 17th centuries during an outbreak of plague in Newcastle. It marked the spot, three miles from the town walls, where local farmers could leave produce to be collected by townsfolk.

The name High Cross survived in the names of several buildings around the site of the original cross. High Cross House was built about 1830 on a site just beyond the point where Adelaide Terrace becomes Elswick Road, and further west were High Cross Farm, High Cross brickworks and a row of cottages known as High Cross Cottages.

This photograph shows High Cross cottages in the 1880s with the original small tower of St James' Church on the right.

And did you know why Bishops Road is so-called?

Benwell Towers, a grand mansion on Benwell Lane, was the official home of the Anglican bishops of Newcastle from 1882-1943.
